PLANNING COMMISSION

(Programme Evaluation Organisation)

RESOLUTION

New Delhi, the 7th December 1956

No. PEO(A)/13(1)/56.—When the community development programme was inaugurated, it was recognised that a periodical evaluation of methods of approach and of results by an independent organisation was essential to the success of the whole movement and that such evaluation should become a nominal administrative practice in all branches of public activity. Accordingly, with the initial support of the Ford Foundation, the Planning Commission set up the Programme Evaluation Organisation as an independent unit for assessing the work of the national extension and community development programme.

2. The tasks entrusted to the organisation were:

- (1) to keep all concerned apprised currently of the progress being made towards accomplishing the programme objectives;
- (2) to point out methods which were proving effective and those which were not;
- (3) to investigate why some recommended practices were adopted while others were rejected by the villagers; and
- (4) to appraise from time to time the impact of the national extension and community development programme on the rural economy and the extent to which, under its influence, social changes being brought about.

The purpose of evaluation was, broadly, to assess whether the programme was succeeding in its fundamental objectives. Evaluation was thought of as a continuous study of extension methods and their effectiveness in reaching every family in the country—especially the less privileged ones—and generating changes in the patterns of society and on outlooks and attitudes.

3. The Programme Evaluation Organisation has submitted three annual evaluation reports on the national extension and community projects. It has also undertaken a number of field surveys and investigations. These reports and studies have been of considerable assistance in assessing the progress of national extension and community projects and have led to suggestions for improving their working. From the beginning two essential features of evaluation work have been stressed, namely that evaluation should be objective and independent of agencies responsible for carrying out programmes and, secondly, that in its technical work and studies the Programme Evaluation Organisation should be entirely free and unhampered.

4. During the Second Five Year Plan, it is proposed that the organisation of the national extension service will spread over the entire country and that not less than 40 per cent. of the national extension blocks will be converted into community development blocks where more intensive work will be undertaken. The Plan envisages that national extension and community projects should be developed as an effective common agency for carrying out all rural development programmes with the fullest co-operation and participation of the people. With the progress of land reform, co-operation, village and small industries and with the rapid pace of urban and industrial development, fundamental changes which are already taking place in the countryside are likely to be further accelerated. It is of the utmost importance that social and economic changes should be analysed objectively as they occur and the effects of economic development on different sections of the rural population observed at first hand.

5. It has been decided that the work of the Programme Evaluation Organisation should be placed under the direction of a Programme Evaluation Board. The Board will consist for the present of three members including a chairman. The chairman of the Board will be a leading economist and one of the members will be a sociologist. The Board will be attached to the Planning Commission for the purpose of presenting its report and for the necessary administrative and financial arrangements. The Board will have full responsibility for planning the work of the Programme Evaluation Organisation and its staff.
